Double Coated Dogs

Think before you clip! Did you know that it's not recommended to clip or shave the coats of certain dog breeds? Your dog's natural coat works as more than just an insulating layer, it also works to keep your dog cool!

While many pet-parents shave their dogs in attempt to keep them cooler during the summer months, in actuality shaving or clipping a double or triple coated dog can result in numerous coat issues or health problems further down the road!

A double coated dog's fur is comprised of topcoat of protecting guard hairs, with a short dense undercoat that traps air and helps to regulate temperature. Shaving a double or triple coated dog's fur can result in sunburn, skin cancer, overheating, and improper coat growth, as well as multiple other other issues both short and long term.

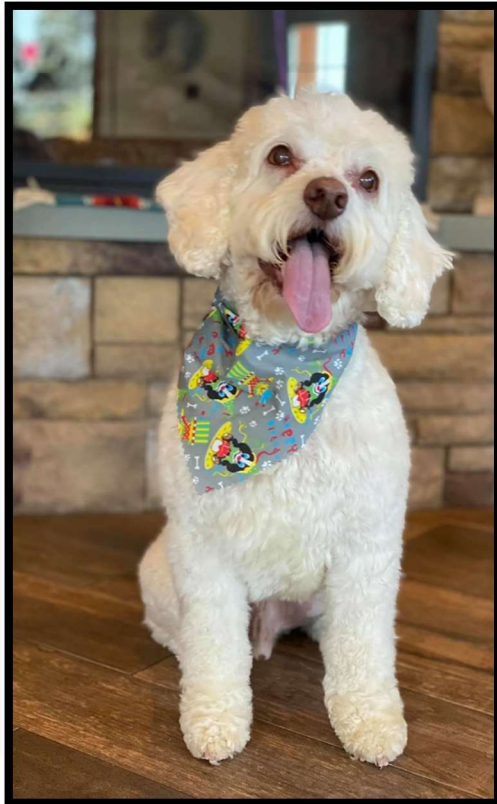

Tip: Double coated dogs come in all sizes from newfoundlands and husky, to terriers and pomeranians. While many double coated dogs are easy to recognize from their fluffy coats, some breeds (like the yorkie terrier) are not as easy recognized.
